In today's highly competitive environment most of Microsoft's practices should not be judged within a legal framework but rather should be seen as aggressive marketing practices. Such extreme cases confuse people and rather than spending time effort and resources to find ways to become more competitive they rely upon a legal system to get them out of the hook. In my opinion the end result of such extreme legal actions is that the consumer does not enjoy the best possible products at the best possible price that come out of competition in so many other markets.
